just putting in my $.02:

Integrating Internet explorer wiht windows should have sent up red flags.
you cant swing a webpage in widows without using Internet explorer.
you cant even uninstall it (it installs automatically on win98 and above) without considerable knowledge.
how can one expect a person who doesnt know much about computers to run netscape if they choose (or any other browser for that matter) microsoft should be broken up into smaller companies. and have to compete.

microsoft makes games that can only be played on microsoft platforms.
that should be one company browsers should be de-integrated and installed by choice.

browser should be a different company.

and the Operating system should be built alone.
another company.

this would encourage better programming on the part of microsoft makeing for a better product for the consumer. and more jobs on the market. (from competeing companies and MS itself)

again just my $.02
